Ronnie and Obby departed this morning for England, and I to the office.

I talked to Barrett McGurn about the Saar.

This afternoon I sat for my portrait by Leonor Fini. It was the third session, and she seemed satisfied with the progress she has made. The resulting picture will at least possess the merit, or demerit, of being radically different from the conventional portraits of the previous Ambassadors.

We were to dine tonight with Liliane and Elie but, as E. had just regained her equilibrium, we remained at home.
